SEEKING HIDDEN SPANISH SILVER

Lure of Phantom Treasure Leads to Extensive Excavations in the Ozark Mountains.

Little Rock, Ark., Aug. 1.—No quest for the lure of gold at the end of the rainbow was ever so eagerly pursued as is the hunt for the lost Spanish silver mine in Arkansas today. Thousands of dollars are being expended in this hunt, and it is not the dreamers, the filibuster or the soldier of fortune who leads the vain search for the millions, but bankers, wealthy planters and even United States senators are interested.

Mysterious charts in the possession of a Mexican form the foundation for the lure of the phantom silver, and so much has been discovered that even the most skeptical, after looking upon the excavations at Redding, in the Ozark mountains, twenty miles from a railroad, is forced to confess there will probably be disclosures of treasure before the work is completed.

In addition to this, Hot Springs claims the lost Louisiana mine as one of its attractions. Father McMillin, a local Catholic priest, being the owner of the property upon which the alleged mine is supposed to be located, four miles from the Valley of Vipers.

No excavation took place after centuries, has given forth more in the way of prehistoric relics than a more complete set of microliths than the excavations at Redding have disclosed. Translation of these mysterious signs, which cover the surface of a sandstone bluff 20 yards in length and 10 feet high, is impossible, the Smithsonian institution having made a vain attempt at finding a solution which requested to go into the matter by Senator James P. Clarke.

For fifteen years excavations have been under way at the Redding hillside. Millions of cubic yards of dirt have been removed, but the entrance to the vault which is supposed to contain the buried treasure has not yet been found.

According to tradition, the "Catholic treasure," mysterious millions in gold and jewels, lies somewhere under this sandstone bluff. The Mexican government at one time offered a reward of $250,000 for the recovery of the treasure. It is supposed the party which buried the gold, silver and pearls was murdered by Indians and the location of the vault died with them. These charts being all that remained. These charts became a part of the records of the Mexican government, President Diaz himself being their custodian. They later came into possession of Gonzales, Melia, Warner and other men who at times stood high in government. They are Gonzales and Warner who have led the search in the vicinity of Redding.

There has been a mystery about the red sandstone bluff for many years. The property is now in possession of L. G. Hill, a prosperous planter who himself spent $500 in the search for the treasure. For Smith, bankers and bankers have also expended a large amount of money to carry on the investigation.

Years ago a Mexican appeared in the vicinity of Mulberry and displayed a chart upon which were hieroglyphs of curious design. He spoke broken English, but was able to make it known he was looking for a red sandstone bluff beside a river. There is only one such bluff in Arkansas, and it was soon located. Here the Mexican said the hidden treasure would be found, and ever since the quest has been on, but many believe the wily Mexicans have already removed the treasure.

When Arkansas was government property a Catholic priest, knowing of the buried treasure, though unable to give the exact location, purchased all the land between the Arkansas and the White rivers, even into what is now Missouri and Oklahoma. The government disputed his right of possession and the matter went to court, the priest being the victim of a non-suit because he could not describe the property by notes and bounds. This much is a matter of government record. Catholic priests of Arkansas who have more interest in the work than any other class, and they will readily subscribe to a fund to look for the lost treasure.

According to the chart supplied by the Mexican, when the bluff was located its entire face would be covered with the hieroglyphs shown upon the mysterious parchment. The red sandstone bluff was located. The rock, almost blood red, showed only a few feet above the ground. A gentle slope, covered with oak trees, some over three feet in diameter, led to the banks of Mulberry creek. This bluff, evidently 60 or more years of age, has been removed, and though the hieroglyphs are clearly shown upon the bare face of the bluff the tunnel leading to the vault has not been located.

At the base of the bluff, where the hieroglyphs of the gold and silver began to fill in with earth, a tunnel was dug, the Mexican informed those who were assisting in the excavating, a black sandstone, something ahead of the black sandstone, would be found. This black sandstone has been entered, but still the entrance to the vault is mysteriously missing. There is nothing on the chart which he says will be found, and the searchers are determined to continue the quest if they have to uncover the face of the entire mountain range, for $200,000, the value of the alleged hidden treasure, they believe to be worth the cost of excavation.

The old Mexican now in charge has informed the people who are defraying the expenses of the expedition that when the entrance to the vault is found it will make itself known by 11 skeletons. He says these are the bones of men who assisted in tunneling into the mountain and burying the treasure, they declined to bind themselves to secrecy. They were put to death by their comrades and their bodies placed in front of the entrance to the vault as a warning to others in the party. This search for the hidden treasure, which will indicate the end of the quest, goes merrily on.

As far back as the memory of the oldest settler of western Arkansas goes Mexicans have made annual excursions to that section of the country. They came individually and in great numbers. At one time when the white men that began to encroach upon the land of the Indian west of the Mississippi river a great band of Mexicans was found camped near the present excavations. They drove back the white men, and a treaty between the forces, after the white men had banded together and a battle was imminent, was effected. The
